“At City on a Hill I learned of the need for inner city missions trips right here in the U.S. We were taught about racial reconciliation, compassion, servanthood and evangelism and then lived it out. The poverty simulation was hard. It gave me a very small taste of what living a life of poverty would be like. I got to see the ways that God provides and I had to place my full trust in Him. [We] still had the hope that in 40 hours our poverty simulation would be over, while others living in poverty do not know when or how they will ever escape. I will never forget my experience. It has entirely changed the way that I think about things. After returning home and talking with my parents I began volunteering at a soup kitchen in the community of Madison.”
